This workshop gave me a deeper and broader understanding of how and why I assess my learners. It showed me the 'right way' to create and use criteria based assessment.

Where Assessment Meets Thinking and Learning

A symbiotic relationship exists between thinking, learning and criterion-based formative and summative assessment and evaluation. Criteria, when void of thinking, result in little more than quantity statements and/or statements of subjective quality language. Neither stretches the learner in his performance, and the latter results in confusion and often a need for moderation. When a learner is provided with criteria but not given the opportunity to develop deep knowledge and understanding of their elements through the infusion of learning process, the criteria use is compromised and the end result becomes so much less than it could be. It's about the thinking process. It's about the learning process. It's about the relationship between assessment, thinking and learning. Indeed – it's where assessment meets thinking and learning!

- Would you like to design criteria that embed rigor and promote the development of deep knowledge and deep understanding?
- Would you like to design completely objective criteria that guarantee consistent judgements?
- Would you like to create criteria that meet the personalised needs of your learners?
- Would you like your learners to independently self-assess, evaluate, set, monitor and prove goals against evidence?
- Would you like to embed assessment criteria seamlessly into the design of cross-curricular, inquiry based units?

If you answered yes to any of these questions, then this powerful, practice-changing workshop is for you!
